BlueSoleil is a simple application that can help you to connect to Bluetooth devices and other mobile phones or PCs .E-voting technology has been around for years, but has only just recently begun to be tested and used in significant numbers across the U.S. The technology, known as e-voting, usually presents a ballot and votes can be cast via touchscreen computers or touch-sensitive phone or tablet apps. Some estimates say up to 30 million people in the U.S. will use e-voting this year. Large-scale testing has begun at a few locations since the Supreme Court held that voting laws that disenfranchise the poor must be struck down. The Brennan Center for Justice in New York recently sent 12,000 e-mail invitations to New Yorkers to test vote-by-mail balloting in their city. Ohio conducted more than 1,000 pilot tests of e-voting in 2012, according to reports from The Cleveland Plain Dealer and The Columbus Dispatch. Federal Voting Assistance Program grants from the Bush and Obama administrations have helped states conduct e-voting experiments, but so far only the University of California, San Diego, is planning an election using e-voting for a large population. The San Diego Online Elections Experiment, scheduled to take place in early March, will help the U.S. Department of Defense decide whether to adopt e-voting for their online voter registration and voting services, according to The San Diego Union-Tribune. The software, developed by New York City's New York University Tandon School of Engineering, aims to create "a systematic way to research and develop e-voting using a technical protocol and large-scale simulation experiments." Like the San Diego project, the experiment will allow voters to either mark their selections with a stylus or type them in, something that has been tested in smaller trials elsewhere. In San Diego, computer code will be used to simulate the results, and will test the degree of accuracy in accounting for voters who mark their ballots in a way different from the plan or type. The experiment will also look at how the results are stored for later analysis, and will evaluate whether touchscreen voting machines remain "close to zero chance of being hacked."Q: How to execute multiple values from a text file by using getopt I have
