Use of digital photography to evaluate the performance of a low-cost hand-held instrument for dental caries detection. To evaluate the performance of a low-cost hand-held digital camera with a fluorescence lamp and a single light-emitting diode (LED) as an alternative to traditional light-emitting diode (LED)-illuminated caries detector, to detect white spot lesions on permanent molars. Three independent examiners determined the presence or absence of white spot lesions on permanent molars under randomised conditions. The accuracy of detection was determined using a digital camera (Canon Powershot A590) with a "Hybrid Capture" attachment, which consists of a fluorescence lamp and a single LED. This procedure was compared to a standard "Hybrid Capture" attachment (CLIA Flexi Plus, DNA Genotek, Ontario, Canada) using a mercury vapour lamp. Comparisons between the two procedures were made using the "crossover" method. The three examiners determined that the digital camera was sensitive (86.2% for examiners 1 and 2; 94.4% for examiner 3) and specific (94.4% for examiners 1 and 2; 100% for examiner 3) in detecting white spot lesions. Examiners' agreement was high (97.8% for examiners 1 and 2; 100% for examiner 3) for both the digital camera and the mercury vapour lamp. Agreement between the two procedures was 4bc0debe42
